

Publications Online – copyright and terms of use

This website and its content is copyright of Labour Research Department

The material can be used by individuals who are members of the organisation which has subscribed to the service (for example members of a union branch or students in a specific department or following a specific course). This is subject to any limits, such as a limit on the total number of users or on the overall size of the organisation, which the Labour Research Department may subsequently set.

The organisation and the individuals concerned must take appropriate steps (for example by changing passwords and keeping them confidential) to ensure that unauthorised persons do not have access to the material.

Individuals entitled to have access to the service may print or download the material for research to support their trade union activities and for private study. However, they may not sell or otherwise distribute this material to those who are not entitled to have access to it. This prohibition includes the free distribution of material, other than in the form of brief extracts, which must also include the source of the material. This also applies to material used on social media.

All commercial exploitation of the material is prohibited without the express written permission of the Labour Research Department.
